Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from A Woman s Vengeance: A Novel It is early summer and early morning in the most picturesque of English cities - Oxford. Nobody is astir in the gray streets; the heavy college gates, and even the small posters cut in them (for the admission of gay young under-graduate dogs after hours), are as yet fast closed. The parks and pleasure-grounds are all deserted, under whose stately trees so many generations I of youth have dreamed their day-dreams. The quads, with their trim lawns, which have echoed for centuries to boyish laughter, are silent. The plaintive caw of the half-awakened rooks, as the swaying elm-tree rocks them, alone is heard, save the voice of Time itself - the Guardian I Time, who here holds all things in its solemn keeping. First the four musical quarters, and then the five beats of the iron tongue. From a score of ancient churches issue the same warning sounds, and silence reigns again, more indisputably than ever. In other places, at such an hour, Time s voice seems to make solemn protest: A quarter gone; two; three; four. Another hour, poor mortals, from the sum of your days; and yet you spend it sleeping! But Time is at home here, and does not preach. What need for preaching in a place where every stone is a sermon? Other cities have withstood sieges; other cities have brought forth martyrs; other cities (not many) can date their origin from earlier ages. But this one is far more venerable (save to the mere antiquary) as being that city in which the years of man, in place of being threescore years and ten, are...
