(Plates ix. -xii. and XII. bis. ) To naturalists generally the Land of the Bird of Paradise has ever been a source of interest, but to Australian students such a land, whose past history is intimately bound up with that of our own continent, should be especially attractive. Many archaic forms doubtless survive in that vast unknown region whose mountains, the loftiest in Australasia, possess every climate from the cold zone above the tree line to the tropical jungles of the littoral. Twenty years ago the coast of British New Guinea was a blank on the map, being less known than that of any country outside the Polar regions, and to-day the interior is almost entirely unexplored. What scanty information we possess concerning its fauna and flora...
