E always removed our hats before entering a church: it is the custom of the country, and we were without prejudices. If we saw a clergyman wondering at the rapid growth of nettles and docks and wild heliotrope over his little freehold, we took off our hats to him. I don t mention this in a vain-glorious spirit, only once or twice we were looked on with suspicion, and shown dirty fingermarks upon walls, and scratches made with knives upon monuments, and detestable rhymes scribbled in pencil, where they could be seen. We were shown some writing which was discovered pinned to the altar after a strange gentleman and lady had made the round of the church, and gone away. The verger apologized when showing us the writing, which he did only in order to justify his looking upon us with some degree of suspicion. We felt sorry for the lady and gentleman, and they might have been sorry for themselves, if we could have talked to them for a few minutes in a convenient place. The vicar came in and insisted on showing us his treasures. They were not many, and we wished them more, for his sake, he was so anxious to make us forget having been told that a gentleman with a soft cap, and a lady with no cap at all, should have been guilty of pinning an indecent writing to God s altar. He pitied them; and Guy...
