B-271489 20 to increased staff turnover. Given these conditions, Labor officials acknowledged that an employer in a largely nonunion area who had been paying lower than average wages would have an incentive to chisel or report wages and fringe benefits levels somewhat lower than what he or 21 she was actually paying, in an attempt to lower the Davis-Bacon rate. To the extent that the submission of fraudulent or inaccurate data is perceived by the construction industry to be a widespread problem, it could also erode survey participation support among the interested parties. Officials from one industry association reported that despite training classes and other assistance it provides, it was difficult for the association to foster employer survey participation, especially among the nonunion contractors. To the extent that participants beliefs about erroneous data being used as the basis for Labors wage determinations became widespread, the number of survey respondents would likely...
